

Jessica Murdock:

- Preparation
 - Jessica was always prepared during meetings and came in with some good ideas, especially at the start. It was never a one sided conversation.
- Contribution
 - Jessica did contribute a good chunk of input in each discussion we had. It goes back to her being prepared; she knew what she was talking about, so she was able to discuss her ideas fully and well. She also clearly communicated when she was working on specific parts and came up with a good labor division scheme to prevent merge conflicts in the project.
- Respect for others' ideas
 - She was constantly respectful and listened to when I had some concerns over some visualization steps. She was also respectful of the ideas for the visualizations that I did for the reader breakdown.
- Flexibility
 - When I was having issues with making the tauruses work with our original vision, she was amenable to me removing it for the sake of ease and time constraints. She was very flexible when issues came up and things needed to be done to compensate.

Michael Gradone (Self):

- Preparation
 - I believe I was always prepared to discuss our visualizations both together and with our assigned TA.
- Contribution
 - I always tried to give helpful contributions, outside of trying to lighten the discussions with small jokes. I made sure that everything I said would help give some idea moving forward, concerns when they were warranted, etc.
- Respect for others' ideas
 - I always follow the rule of "speak less and listen more" when it comes to listening to others proposals. I want to hear out their ideas fully and first ask them questions if I'm not understanding something. If I have any concerns, then I bring it up as a casual manner to see if we can solve it before we
- Flexibility
 - I like to think I was flexible with our timeline and what we wanted to deliver. I was all for looking at the library/education/literacy achievement rates but when we found it would be too much, backed off of it.